Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: . use of the memories of one annoyance to protect me from the other. Before bringing this paper to a close, I must refer again to the role of the sensory stimulus in the dream. Such stimuli when they are present merely determine the direction the dream takes in its lightning-like search for dream material likely to prove useful in the expression of the dream wish. As an instance, a hot-water bottle at the feet will not cause a dream of weary wandering over a hot desert, unless such an idea is easily available in the psychological storehouse of the dreamer; and not even then without there be present adequate and recent associations to such a group of ideas going to form the dream. Such associations should have been found the evening before the dream, or at least within a day or two prior. Otherwise the hot-water bottle might cause a dream of inquisitorial torture, or perhaps no dream at all--merely waking the sleeper. In closing I will cite, in illustration of the role of the sensory stimulus, a dream--again one of my own. because I know of no example in the literature representing any more remarkable assimilation of such stimuli, and particularly since I subjected the dream to a complete analysis and found that in this respect it did not differ from any other of the type of dream originating apparently de novo. The dream was as follows: / was transported to the days and...
